I am frequently bothered by persons knocking on the door with a tray selling dusters etc. Groups of young persons ate brought to the area by bus and are walking the streets. They appear to have some sort of certification. They are a complete nuisance and difficult to get rid of. If this situation is going to get worse because of the removal of Peddlers Act then this is not acceptable. Are you certain that this type of selling comes under the new directive or is Government using this to get rid of yet another regulation in their bonfire of the regulations? Why does the Government want to make life in the UK so much worse? I recently replied to the planning consultation to try to stop neighbours building large extensions without planning permissions. Why does the Government think that a lack of regulation improves quality of life? The country will be unrecognizable after this Government has gone which will be soon because their policies are so unpopular.

Jackie Terry

[redacted]