We need to collect evidence and share insights. Then we can identify what people need, now and in the future and what assets are available locally.

What are we doing now? – how well is it working and how efficient is it?

So what have we achieved? What differences have we made to people’s lives?

We can use our achievements against outcomes to feed into our analysis of the area’s needs.

What services do we need to commission or de-commission; provide and shape both separately and jointly?

What are our key priorities for collective action?

We need to analyse our progress against local needs.

What does our population and place look like?

We can match these outcomes against Outcomes Framework and local measures.

We need to review commissioning plans, including evidence of effective and value for money interventions.

What services do we need to commission or de-commission; provide and shape both separately and jointly?

We also need to agree how we can achieve these priorities together.

We need to prioritise action that will make an impact across health and care.

Involving partners and the community ensures transparency and accountability.
