Is family mediation right for everyone?
Family mediation works for most people. At the MIAM the mediator will talk to you about whether mediation will work for you both and tell you about other options that could still avoid you having to go to court, for example collaborative law or solicitor negotiation.

What if I want to go to court?
The law says that you must consider whether mediation can help you before you can take a case to court. A judge can halt your case until this has happened. You will need to show the court that
a) you have been to a MIAM to find out about mediation, or
b) you don’t need to do this because of special circumstances which are listed in section 11 of form C100.

Special circumstances include cases involving domestic violence or child abuse, which may not be right for mediation – the mediator can advise you on this at the MIAM or first meeting. Alternatively, if you have evidence of domestic violence or child abuse you may not need to go to a MIAM and may be able to get Legal Aid to pay for a solicitor to help you bring your case to court.

Will we have to pay for mediation?
If you’re on a low income and able to get Legal Aid then the information meeting (the MIAM) and mediation sessions will be free. You may also get financial help to pay for legal advice in connection with mediation if you feel you need it.

If one of you qualifies for Legal Aid but the other doesn’t, you will still both be able to have an information meeting and the first session of mediation for free. Even if neither of you can claim Legal Aid, you may still save money by trying mediation first, rather than going straight to a lawyer.

Family mediation helps if your relationship has broken down and you need to sort out practical issues such as:

• Arrangements for children – where they are going to live and when you’ll see them
• Child maintenance payments
• Sharing finances (e.g. house, savings, pension)
• Dealing with any debts.
What is family mediation?

If you are separating or divorcing, family mediation helps you sort out disputes—without involving big legal fees or going through a long drawn-out court battle.

Professional family mediators help you work out what happens after you split up. They won't try to get you and your ex-partner back together. They can also help when you've been separated a while and need to sort something out. A mediator will listen to you and your ex-partner explain your concerns and views to each other and will help you both to reach an agreement.

Mediation works by helping people find practical solutions that feel fair. Some people who can't afford mediation can get it for free through the 'Legal Aid' scheme.

What are the benefits?

Family mediation:
• gives you more say about what happens. In court a judge will make the decisions. With mediation you and the other party make the decisions.
• is less stressful, with less conflict between you and your partner. If you have children it is less upsetting for them. It can help find ways for everyone to get on better in the future.
• improves communication and helps you sort out your future.
• agreements can be reviewed and changed if you both agree – e.g. if your situation changes, and as your children get older and have different needs.
• is easier on your children when parents co-operate and helps them continue important family relationships.
• is quicker, cheaper and provides a better way to sort out disagreements than long drawn-out court battles—helping you to get on with the rest of your life as quickly as possible.
