Dear sir,

When Cineworld took over the Picture House many ,including myself ,were concerned that they may simply close it down. Our fears were were unfounded as they clearly appreciated the very different "brand" and it continues to cater for a completely different audience.

Although some films are shown at both venues, in recent years my wife and I have visited Cineworld only once because the Picture House was sold out.I would mention our enjoyment was spoilt due to the the noise transmission from the the latest"blockbuster" being screened next door- we have not returned!

A high percentage of the patrons are what are known as the "grey" market ,whose decisions are not always influenced by price.

Both venues show films,but there the similarity finishes,rather like comparing Singapore Airways with Ryanair.

Bury St Edmunds is a very special town with a Georgian theatre,Concert hall as well as the two cinemas and other fine public buildings.I would urge you to allow the town to continue to enjoy the choice that others envy.

David Bedford.
