What is the problem under consideration? Why is government intervention necessary?

Currently, the majority of prisoners serving a determinate custodial sentence are automatically released on licence at the halfway point of their sentence, regardless of the seriousness of their offending, and without any assessment of their suitability for release. Relevant offenders who have been found by the court to meet the dangerousness threshold set by the Criminal Justice Act 2003 may be given an Extended Determinate Sentence (EDS). Some offenders who currently receive an EDS are automatically released on licence at the two-thirds point of their custodial term, even though they have been found to be dangerous at the time of sentence. Further, there are certain serious terrorism offences and offences that may be charged in serious terrorism cases that are not currently on Schedule 15B and are therefore not subject to the enhanced dangerous offender regime.

What are the policy objectives and the intended effects?

The policy objectives are to ensure that the most serious offenders, and all dangerous offenders serving an EDS, are subject to early release only at the discretion of the Parole Board. Additionally, the addition of certain terrorism offences, and offences that may be charged in serious terrorism cases, to Schedule 15B of the Criminal Justice Act 2003, and the increase in some maximum penalties to life imprisonment is to reflect the seriousness of modern terrorist offending. Public confidence should be increased if the most serious offenders can only be released early after Parole Board assessment. Offenders should be encouraged to take responsibility for their rehabilitation.

What policy options have been considered, including any alternatives to regulation? Please justify preferred option (further details in Evidence Base)

Option 0 - Do nothing: continue the current release arrangements for serious violent and sexual offenders.
Option 1 - Make the following changes to the release arrangements for serious violent and sexual offenders:

1. All offenders given an Extended Determinate Sentence must apply to the Parole Board for release between the two-thirds point and the end of their custodial term .
2. All adult offenders given a custodial sentence for the most serious child sex and terrorism offences must apply to the Parole Board for release between the half-way point and the end of their custodial term.
3. To add certain terrorism offences, and offences that may be charged in serious terrorism cases, to Schedule 15B of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 and to increase the maximum penalty to life imprisonment where this is not already available

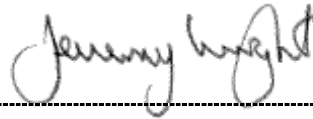

The preferred option is Option 1, as this package constitutes proactive steps to increase public confidence on sensitive criminal justice issues; should encourage offenders to take responsibility for their rehabilitation; and will allow for robust sentences to protect the public in a wide range of terrorism cases.

As the full impact of these proposals is not realised until 2030, and we do not have reliable cost estimates this far in the future, we have not monetised the costs.

Other key non-monetised costs by 'main affected groups'

We estimate that these proposals will result in an increase in the prison population of around 1,000 places, in the long run, with the full impact reached by 2030. We estimate that there would be no increase in the prison population in this Spending Review period (ending March 2015), there would be an increase of less than 10 prison places in the next Spending Round period (ending March 2016), and that there would be an increase of around 300 prison places by March 2020.

We estimate that these proposals would result in an increase of around 1,100 Parole Board hearings per year, in the long run, with the full impact reached by 2030. We estimate that there would be no increase in Parole Board hearings in this Spending Review period (ending March 2015), there would be an increase of less than 50 hearings per year in the next Spending Round period (ending March 2016), and that there would be an increase of around 400 hearings per year by March 2020.

Best Estimate	Not Quantified	Not Quantified	Not Quantified

Description and scale of key monetised benefits by 'main affected groups'

Not quantified.

Other key non-monetised benefits by 'main affected groups'

We expect benefits to society, and in particular victims of crime, through the introduction of a new framework for the most serious offending, which ensures that offenders are not released early unless the Parole Board believes it is appropriate to do so, thereby enhancing public confidence in the criminal justice system. There is a potential benefit to offenders in that discretionary release should encourage them to take responsibility for their rehabilitation.

Key assumptions/sensitivities/risks

We have assumed that all offenders will have a Parole Board hearing when they reach the half-way or two-thirds point of their sentence, and subsequent hearings every 15 months, until the end of their sentence. We assume that the Parole Board release 16% of offenders at each Parole Board hearing, which is the 2012/13 release rate for indeterminate sentence for public protection prisoners.

Evidence Base

Extended Determinate Sentences

1. The Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012 (LASPO) abolished Sentences of Imprisonment for Public Protection (IPPs) from 3 December 2012 and replaced them with new Extended Determinate Sentences (EDS). Currently, it is only possible to make an estimate, using prison population data, of the number of offenders given an EDS since 3rd December 2012. The best current estimate is that 343 offenders were sentenced to an EDS between 3rd December 2012 and up to and including 30th June 2013.
2. Our best current estimate is that around one-quarter of these offenders are sentenced to an EDS with automatic release at the two-thirds point of their sentence, and around three-quarters of these offenders must apply to the Parole Board for release between the two-thirds point and the end of their custodial term.

Sexual Offences against children

3. In 2012, 269 adult offenders were given immediate custodial sentences for the most serious sex offences against children, as specified in the 2003 Sexual Offences Act. These offences are:
 - Rape of a female child under 13 by a male
 - Rape of a male child under 13 by a male
 - Attempted rape of a female child under 13 by a male
 - Attempted rape of a male child under 13 by a male
 - Assault of a female child under 13 by penetration
 - Assault of a male child under 13 by penetration
4. Of these, 47 were given an IPP and 4 were given a life sentence. The remaining 218 offenders were given a determinate custodial sentence.
5. Our best current estimate is that these offences account for 7% of Extended Determinate Sentences. As these offences are on Schedule 15B of the 2003 Criminal Justice Act, an offender sentenced to an EDS for these offences must apply to the Parole Board for release between the two-thirds point and the end of their custodial term.
6. Before the implementation of the 2003 Sexual Offences Act in May 2005, these sexual offences against children under 13 were charged as sexual offences against children aged under 16, under the 1956 Sexual Offences Act. There were 285 offenders given determinate custodial sentences in 2012 for rape or attempted rape of a child aged under 16. Around half of these offenders committed the offence before May 2005, but we do not know how many of the victims were aged under 13.

Terrorism Offences

7. Figure 1 shows the list of terrorism act offences, for which, under the new proposals, the offender must apply to the Parole Board for release between the half-way point and the end of their custodial term. This table also indicates which of these offences are not currently included in Schedule 15B to the Criminal Justice Act, and therefore should be added, and which offences should have the maximum sentence increased to life imprisonment. The Home Office publish data on the number of offenders convicted under these terrorism acts, which is also shown¹.

8. Figure 1 shows that 25 offenders were convicted for these terrorism act offences in the year ending June 2013, and 8 offenders were convicted in the year ending June 2012.
9. Figure 2 shows the list of non-terrorism act offences, for which, under the new proposals, (if given a custodial sentence other than a life sentence or an Extended Determinate Sentence) the offender must apply to the Parole Board for release between the half-way point and the end of their custodial term, if the offence has a terrorist connection. This table also indicates which of these offences are not currently included in Schedule 15B of the Criminal Justice Act 2003², and therefore should be added, and which offences should have the maximum sentence increased to life imprisonment.

² To ensure consistency with Schedule 15B we are also adding the following offences to Schedule 15 to the Criminal Justice Act 2003: the common law offence of incitement to murder, an offence under Part 2 of the Serious Crime Act 2007 committed in relation to murder, making or possession of explosive under suspicious circumstances (s.4 Explosive Substances Act 1883).

10. While the Home Office data does not show the number of offenders convicted for these individual offences, it does show that there were 4 offenders convicted in the year ending June 2013 for non-terrorism act offences, where the offence was terrorism related, and 6 convicted in the year ending June 2012.¹

Impact Assessment

Problem under consideration

11. Currently the majority of prisoners serving a determinate custodial sentence are automatically released on licence at the halfway point of their sentence, regardless of the seriousness of their offending, and without any assessment of their suitability for release. Relevant offenders who have been found by the court to meet the dangerousness threshold set by the Criminal Justice Act 2003 are given an Extended Determinate Sentence (EDS). Some offenders who receive an EDS currently are automatically released on licence at the two-thirds point of their custodial term, although they have been found to be dangerous at the time of sentence. Further, there are certain potentially serious terrorism offences and offences that may be charged in serious terrorism cases that are not currently on Schedule 15B of the Criminal Justice Act 2003, and are therefore not subject to the enhanced dangerous offender regime.

Rationale for intervention

12. We expect benefits to society, and in particular victims of crime, through the extension of discretionary release, and changes to sentences for terrorism offences. Public confidence should be increased if the most serious offenders can only be released early after Parole Board assessment. Offenders should be encouraged to take responsibility for their rehabilitation.

Policy objective

13. The policy objectives are to ensure that the most serious offenders, and all dangerous offenders serving an EDS, are subject to discretionary early release. Additionally, the addition of terrorism offences to Schedule 15B of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 and the increase in some maximum penalties to life imprisonment will reflect the seriousness of modern terrorist offending.

Option 0 - Do nothing

14. Do nothing: continue the current release and sentencing arrangements for serious violent and sexual offenders.

Option 1 - legislative changes

15. Make the following changes to the release arrangements for serious violent and sexual offenders:

- I. All offenders given an Extended Determinate Sentence must apply to the Parole Board for release between the two-thirds point and the end of their custodial term
 - II. All adult offenders given a custodial sentence for the most serious child sex and terrorism offences must apply to the Parole Board for release between the half-way point and the end of their custodial term
 - III. To add certain terrorism offences, and offences that may be charged in serious terrorism cases, to Schedule 15B of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 and to increase the maximum penalty to life imprisonment where this is not already available.
16. The preferred option is Option 1, as this package constitutes proactive steps to increase public confidence on sensitive criminal justice issues; should encourage offenders to take responsibility for their rehabilitation; and will allow for robust sentences to protect the public in a wide range of terrorism cases. In view of the sensitivity of public confidence in respect of high end offending, and the policy imperative to protect the public from dangerous offenders, the benefits are considered to outweigh the costs.

All offenders given Extended Determinate Sentences must apply to the Parole Board for early release

Aims and outcomes for the policy

17. To ensure that offenders serving an EDS must apply to the Parole Board for early release.

Costs

18. Our best estimate is that around 160 offenders will be given an EDS with automatic release in 2013.
19. We have estimated the impact on the prison population and Parole Board workload by using our best estimates of the number of offenders that will be affected by this proposal, and their current sentence lengths, and using assumptions about when these offenders are likely to have a Parole Board hearing, and the likelihood of being released at each of these hearings.
20. We estimate that if all these offenders were to apply to the Parole Board for release, there would be an increase in the prison population of around 200 places in the long run, with the full impact reached by 2025. We estimate that there would be no increase in the prison population in this Spending Review period (ending March 2015), there would be an increase of less than 10 prison places in the next Spending Round period (ending March 2016), and that there would be an increase of around 100 prison places by March 2020.
21. There would also be an increase in the number of Parole Board hearings. We estimate that there would be an increase of around 300 Parole Board hearings per year in the long run, with the full impact reached by 2025. We estimate that there would be no increase in Parole Board hearings in this Spending Review period (ending March 2015), there would be an increase of less than 20 hearings per year in the next Spending Round period (ending March 2016), and that there would be an increase of around 200 hearings per year by March 2020.
22. As the full impact of this proposal is not realised until 2025, and we do not have reliable cost estimates this far in the future, we have not monetised the costs.

Benefits

23. We expect benefits to society, and in particular victims of crime, through the extension of discretionary release to all prisoners who have been found by the courts to be dangerous. This proposal ensures that these offenders are not released early unless the Parole Board believes it is appropriate to do so, thereby enhancing public confidence in the criminal justice system. There is a potential benefit to offenders in that discretionary release should encourage them to take responsibility for their rehabilitation.
24. There could be a saving to probation if these offenders receive a shorter time supervised in the community, as they spend longer in custody. We have not quantified these savings as they are very uncertain. We have also not quantified any changes to the time spent on recall by these offenders.

Risks and assumptions

Assumption	Risk
Our estimate on the number of offenders who will receive an EDS with automatic release assumes that judges continue to give this sentence at the same rate between July and December 2013 as they did between December 2012 and June 2013.	There is a risk that judges could give more or fewer of these sentences, leading to an inaccurate estimation of the impact of this proposal.
We have assumed that all offenders will have a Parole Board hearing when they reach the two-thirds point of their custodial term, and subsequent hearings every 15 months, until the end of their custodial term. We assume that the Parole Board release 16% of offenders at each Parole Board hearing, which is the 2012/13 release rate for indeterminate sentenced for public protection prisoners ³ .	There is a risk that offenders could have Parole Board hearings at longer or shorter intervals, and that the Parole Board release more or fewer offenders. This could lead to an inaccurate estimation of the impact of this proposal.
We have assumed that the offenders will receive the same sentence length under the new provisions.	Judges could decide to give longer or shorter sentence lengths under the new provisions, leading to an inaccurate estimation of the impact of this proposal.

All offenders given a custodial sentence for the most serious child sex and terrorism offences must apply to the Parole Board for early release

Aims and outcomes for the policy

25. To ensure that the most serious child sex and terrorism offenders must apply to the Parole Board for early release.

Costs

26. We estimate that up to around 300 of the most serious child sex and terrorism offenders will now need to apply for the Parole Board for early release. We have estimated this by considering:

- The 218 offenders who were given a determinate sentence for a serious child sex offence in 2012.
- As explained in paragraph 6, we do not know the number of offenders who were sentenced in 2012 for rape of a child aged under 16 under the 1956 sexual offences act, when the victim was aged under 13. We therefore assume that around 50 additional offenders would need to apply to the Parole Board for early release after conviction under the 1956 act.
- As explained in paragraphs 8 and 10, up to around 30 offenders per year, who are convicted for the most serious terrorism offences.

27. We have estimated the impact on the prison population and Parole Board workload by using our best estimates of the number of offenders that will be affected by this proposal, and their current sentence lengths, and using assumptions about when these offenders are likely to have a Parole Board hearing, and the likelihood of being released at each of these hearings.

28. We estimate that if all these offenders were to apply to the Parole Board for early release, there would be an increase in the prison population of around 800 places in the long run, with the full impact reached by 2030. We estimate that there would be no increase in the prison population in this Spending Review period (ending March 2015), there would be an increase of less than 10 prison places in the next Spending Round period (ending March 2016), and that there would be an increase of around 200 prison places by March 2020.

³ The Parole Board Annual Report and Accounts for 2012/13, July 2013.

29. There would also be an increase in the number of Parole Board hearings. We estimate that there would be an increase of around 800 Parole Board hearings per year in the long run, with the full impact reached by 2030. We estimate that there would be no increase in Parole Board hearings in this Spending Review period (ending March 2015), there would be an increase of less than 20 hearings per year in the next Spending Round period (ending March 2016), and that there would be an increase of around 200 hearings per year by March 2020.
30. There will be a licence period at the end of the custodial term, of 1 year, and there could be a cost or saving to NOMS if the time these offenders spend supervised in the community after release changes. We have not quantified these costs or savings as they are very uncertain. We have also not quantified any changes to the time spent on recall by these offenders.
31. As the full impact of this proposal is not realised until 2030, and we do not have reliable cost estimates this far in the future, we have not monetised the costs.

Benefits

32. We expect benefits to society, and in particular victims of crime, through the introduction of a new framework for the most serious offending, which ensures that offenders are not released early unless the Parole Board believes it is appropriate to do so, thereby enhancing public confidence in the criminal justice system. There is a potential benefit to offenders in that discretionary release should encourage them to take responsibility for their rehabilitation.

Risks and assumptions

Assumption	Risk
We have estimated the number of offenders that will be affected by this proposal based on recent data on sentencing for these offenders. There were 47 offenders sentenced to IPPs for these offences in 2012, and our best estimate is that there will be around 40 offenders sentenced to an EDS for these offences in 2013. We have assumed that these EDS offenders will not be affected by this proposal, as they will already apply to the Parole Board for release.	There is a risk that we have over or under estimated the number of offenders affected by this proposal, leading to an inaccurate estimation of the impact of this proposal.
We have assumed that all offenders will have a Parole Board hearing when they reach the two-thirds point of their custodial term, and subsequent hearings every 15 months, until the end of their custodial term. We assume that the Parole Board release 16% of offenders at each Parole Board hearing, which is the 2012/13 release rate for indeterminate sentenced for public protection prisoners ⁴ .	There is a risk that offenders could have Parole Board hearings at longer or shorter intervals, and that the Parole Board release more or fewer offenders. This could lead to an inaccurate estimation of the impact of this proposal.
We have assumed that the offenders will receive the same sentence length under the new provisions.	Judges could decide to give longer or shorter sentence lengths under the new provisions, leading to an inaccurate estimation of the impact of this proposal.

⁴ The Parole Board Annual Report and Accounts for 2012/13, July 2013.

To add certain terrorism offences and offences that may be charged in serious terrorism cases to Schedule 15B of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 and to increase the maximum penalty to life imprisonment where this is not already available

Aims and outcomes for the policy

33. The aim of the policy is to ensure that robust sentences can be imposed where necessary on the most serious and dangerous terrorist offenders.

Costs

34. As explained in paragraphs 8 and 10, we estimate that these changes will apply to less than 10 offenders per year.

35. We estimate that this proposal will have a minimal impact on the prison population, Parole Board and providers of supervision in the community. This is because this proposal will affect a small volume of offenders who have committed very serious offences, and are already likely to currently receive very long custodial sentences.

Benefits

36. This proposal will have benefits for society in that it should enhance public confidence by marking the seriousness of modern terrorist offending. In public protection terms it will ensure that robust sentences can be imposed where necessary on the most serious and dangerous terrorist offenders.

Risks and assumptions

Assumption	Risk
Data recording practices for low volume offences means that we do not have the total volumes of offenders sentenced for these offences, and therefore we have estimated the number of offenders affected by this proposal.	There is a risk that we have over or under estimated the number of offenders affected by this proposal, leading to an inaccurate estimation of the impact of this proposal.

Summary

37. Figure 3 shows a summary of the impacts of the proposals on the prison population and the Parole Board.
