Dear colleagues,

Charges for Household Waste Recycling Centres

It has been brought to our attention that Norfolk County Council is consulting on proposals for a £2 public charge at 9 of its 20 household waste and recycling centres (HWRCs) in a bid to cut costs.

It is our belief that this backdoor bin charge will both inconvenience local council tax paying residents and create perverse incentives.

Charging for using recycling centres will increase the risk of fly-tipping, harming the local environment and diverting taxpayers' money to clean up the mess.

In addition, both Defra and DCLG have an interest in making it easy for people to recycle. A charge for using a household waste site (where for example electrical goods are collected separately for recycling) will mean that householders simply put such items in their residual waste bins, so they end up in landfill.

In terms of legislation, the Environmental Protection Act (Section 51) states that local authorities have a duty to provide sites for the deposit of household waste. Where such sites are provided in fulfilment of this duty, waste must be accepted free of charge.

We are interested to hear how Norfolk County Council squares its charging proposals with the requirements of the Act.

We firmly believe that Norfolk County Council's proposal to charge for HWRCs provision runs against the interests of householders and government's environmental concerns and suggest it seriously revisits its thinking.
