Electricity generation

The infrastructure pipeline published in December 2013 included a number of projects being considered by developers which were listed as having a 2014–15 start date.³ However, as set out in the National Infrastructure Plan 2013 and in the pipeline itself, the number of potential projects being considered by developers exceeds expected demand. It is a sign of a competitive market when developers are considering more schemes than will be required, allowing only the most competitive schemes to come forward into development.

² Subject to Planning

This means that not all of the schemes in the pipeline will be developed, and some may be developed to a different timescale than originally anticipated, with all final investment decisions being made by individual developers.

Weighted assumptions have been applied to the investment figures in the overall pipeline to reflect this. These modelling assumptions will be updated when the pipeline is next fully refreshed to take account of recent changes in the energy market, including announcements on the Capacity Market

As such, while it is still anticipated that a number of electricity generation projects will start this year, these schemes are not included in the list of over 200 projected 2014–15 starts.

The following projects and programmes all currently have projected completion dates for 2014-15. However, where projects and programmes are privately funded, decisions about the final timescale will be taken by individual developers.
