Dear Ladies and Gentlemen,

I would like to answer briefly to the points you requested.
Moreover, I refer to my already submitted statement.

I suggest, that the existing stock should be destroyed and there should not be a time left for distribution or running out these negative circumstances.
That would be a consequent political decision, regardless of any interests. A clear, unequivocal statement to do, what is right.

I recommend, that companies who have respected the law over all (and just sold products within the UK) should get compensations, which can not be so many. The truth is, that most of them sold and delivered from England to other countries, especially in Europe, and damaged other markets without any respect. I think you can see that as a sure clue, that they are not correct people with not legal businesses.
It might be more difficult to come to a political decision, but I think, that everyone has to try to see, that there were not given an opportunity, but a failure, which is now used by criminals. This should be stopped as quick as possible. And a government should not be afraid of consequences from a "Copyright-Mob".

Best regards,

Mirko Wilmanns, [REDACTED] Berlin, Germany,
