Radiological Safety Precautions at Christmas Island

As far as T.P.S. is aware no difficulty has been experienced with the blood examinations of Naval personnel being drafted to Christmas Island.

2. With the present pattern of trials no naval personnel are required to go into the Controlled Area, and so far as can be foreseen there is no likelihood of them requiring to do so in the future.

3. However, should it subsequently be found necessary for Naval personnel to serve in the Controlled Area, it is suggested that the [redacted] should keep Admiralty informed of the names of those ratings. As it is assumed that the medical examination cannot be carried out at Christmas Island, the examination would obviously have to be waived for any such ratings already out there. On the other hand, in the event of ratings being required to serve in the controlled area being drafted from U.K., it is suggested that such ratings are examined before leaving this country.
