

Department for Business & Trade

Draft Revised Code of Practice on Fair and Transparent Distribution of Tips

July 2026

Contents

Foreword..... 3

Introduction and Purpose..... 4

Scope..... 7

 Qualifying Tips 7

 Qualifying Workers..... 8

Fairness 10

 Factors to Consider..... 10

 Review and Consultation 12

 Methods of Allocation and Distribution (including troncs)..... 14

Transparency 16

Addressing Problems 19

Glossary of Terms 20

The Code of Practice on Fair and Transparent Distribution of Tips originally came into effect on Tuesday 01 October 2024, along with specified provisions of the Employment (Allocation of Tips) Act 2023.

Following amendments made by the Employment Rights Act 2025, this Code has been revised. This revised version has been issued in draft. Once further representations are considered, it will come into effect, subject to parliamentary approval.

The Secretary of State for Business and Trade is issuing this revised Code of Practice to promote fairness and transparency in the distribution of tips, gratuities and service charges that fall in scope of the Employment Rights Act 1996.

Foreword

Employers must have regard to the Code when designing and implementing their tipping policies and practices.

It is recommended that all parties attempt to resolve issues between themselves in the first instance.

Acas can support on mediation; seeking mediation will not prevent a worker from submitting a claim to an employment tribunal (ET) if they feel their employer has not acted fairly or transparently.

Where relevant, employment tribunal judges have a duty to take this Code into account when determining disputes relating to tipping practices.

However, failure to fully observe the Code does not in itself amount to proof that an employer has been acting unfairly.

Further non-statutory guidance, which accompanies this Code and helps employers and workers to interpret the legislation, is available via Gov.UK. That non-statutory guidance is not to be treated as incorporated in this Code.

Introduction and Purpose

1. The legislative provisions relating to the allocation and distribution of tips, gratuities and service charges are contained in the Employment Rights Act 1996 (referred to as “the 1996 Act” in the rest of this document).
2. All of the requirements in this Code refer to tips, gratuities and service charges (including those applied automatically by a business and those added discretionarily by a customer), however described. Employers should not seek to avoid the requirements of the law by describing tips, gratuities or service charges using a different label. Whether a payment falls within the scope of legislation will depend on its substance rather than the terminology used. It should be noted that this does not prevent employers from continuing to apply legitimate charges which serve a genuine purpose other than rewarding workers for the service provided.
3. For brevity, “tips, gratuities and service charges” are referred to simply as “tips” throughout the remainder of this document.
4. The 1996 Act was amended by the Employment (Allocation of Tips) Act 2023 (“the Tipping Act”), which was granted Royal Assent on 02 May 2023. The main purpose of the Tipping Act is to ensure the fair and transparent allocation of all tips. The desired outcome of the Tipping Act is to improve fairness for workers by ensuring that the tips consumers leave in recognition of good service and hard work are distributed to the workers as intended. It aims to increase fairness in tipping practices and create a level playing field for employers who already allocate all tips to workers, by ensuring that all employers follow the same rules.
5. Further amendments were made to the law through the Employment Rights Act 2025 (“the 2025 Act”), which introduced new requirements for employers to consult with workers at their place of business when developing or reviewing their tipping policy, and to provide greater transparency around that process. The main desired outcome of the 2025 Act is to enhance worker participation in decisions relating to tipping policies, in particular to benefit those workers who have less of a voice in the workplace.

6. The 1996 Act was amended by the Tipping Act and subsequently by the 2025 Act. Following these amendments, employers are now required to:
 - a. Pass on all tips and service charges to workers without deductions, except in very limited scenarios, such as deduction of income tax. This Code does not affect the provisions around tax in relation to tipping. Further information about how this operates can be found via Gov.UK.
 - b. Ensure that tips are distributed in a fair and transparent manner when the employer takes control, or exerts significant influence, over their distribution.
 - c. Have regard to this Code of Practice on fairness and transparency of tip distribution when they are distributing or influencing the distribution of tips.
 - d. Maintain a written policy on how tips are dealt with at their place of business, review that policy at least once every three years, and ensure that policy is made available to all workers to whom it applies.
 - e. Consult with workers at the place of business when developing or reviewing the tipping policy. Where recognised trade union representatives or other worker representatives exist, consultation should be carried out through these representatives. Where no such representatives exist, employers should consult workers directly.
 - f. Make an anonymised summary of the views expressed during consultation available to all workers at the place of business where the policy applies.
 - g. Maintain a record of all qualifying tips paid at, or otherwise attributable to, their place of business and of the allocation and distribution of those tips between workers, to which workers have the right to request access.
7. The law (see section 27P of the 1996 Act) provides for the Secretary of State to issue a statutory Code of Practice to promote fairness and transparency in relation to the distribution of qualifying tips, gratuities and service charges. This is referred to throughout this document as “the Code” or “this Code”.
8. The Code does not set out an exhaustive list of factors for employers to consider. Instead, it provides overarching principles on what fairness is for the purposes of the Tipping Act, the areas in which employers need to make decisions to comply with their duties, and how they should apply these principles in their specific places of business.

9. Some relevant provisions of the Tipping Act and the 2025 Act (inserted as sections of the 1996 Act) are re-stated briefly at the beginning of sections of this Code; where this is the case, these paragraphs are labelled as “Provisions of the Tipping Legislation”, with remaining paragraphs labelled as “Explanation”. This is to distinguish between occasions where text simply re-states the provisions of the law to aid understanding, and occasions where it seeks to facilitate fairness and transparency, as matters for the Code.

10. This Code is structured as follows:

- a. Scope: Qualifying Tips and Qualifying Workers
- b. Fairness: Factors to Consider, Review and Consultation, and Methods of Allocation and Distribution (including troncs)
- c. Transparency
- d. Addressing Problems
- e. Glossary of Terms

Scope

Qualifying Tips

Provisions of The Tipping Legislation

11. The Tipping Act provides for how employers should deal with qualifying tips, gratuities and service charges and for the Secretary of State to issue a code of practice to promote fair and transparent distribution of these qualifying tips.

12. The Tipping Act defines “qualifying tips, gratuities and service charges” as employer-received tips or as certain worker-received tips. These terms are explained as referring to tips that are themselves either received by the employer, subject to the employer’s control or connected to worker-received tips that are subject to employer control.

Explanation

13. Not all tips are under the scope of the Tipping Act, and therefore subject to the guidance in this Code. The method of payment (e.g. whether it is made by card, in cash or via an alternative method such as an app) does not determine whether a tip is a qualifying tip for the purposes of the legislation and this Code.

14. Broadly speaking, the determining factor in whether a tip is qualifying or not is whether the employer receives (in the case of employer-received tips) or exercises control or significant influence over (in the case of worker-received tips) the distribution of tips. This is most commonly demonstrated when employers first receive the money and then allocate it to workers.

15. If a worker receives and keeps a cash tip, with no employer control or involvement, the tip is out of scope for the legislation and this Code. However, an employer is likely to have exercised control or significant influence over cash tips if they tell staff how to distribute cash tips or if they collect cash tips and distribute them at the end of a shift or as part of the regular payroll.

16. In many instances, an employer is likely to receive and subsequently distribute a tip paid by card or via an alternative electronic method, for example through a mobile app or scanning a QR code; this makes it an employer-received tip, for which the employer is responsible for distributing fairly. However, cash equivalent digital tipping, whereby a customer uses a mobile app or similar method to directly tip members of staff, bypassing the employer altogether, can be regarded as worker-received tipping, which is out of scope for the requirements on employers.

17. Non-monetary tips can also be qualifying tips if they are received or controlled or significantly influenced by the employer. A qualifying non-monetary tip could include a voucher, stamp, token, or similar item that has a fixed value which can be expressed in monetary terms or exchanged for money, goods or services. An example of a non-monetary tip could be a worker in a casino receiving a casino chip (which has a fixed value that can be exchanged) in place of a monetary tip paid by cash or card.

Qualifying Workers

Provisions of The Tipping Legislation

- 18. The law mandates that all workers are entitled to benefit from fair and transparent distribution of their qualifying tips. Employers must ensure that the total amount of qualifying tips paid at a place of business is allocated fairly between workers at that place of business and they should have regard to this Code when determining that (section 27D of the 1996 Act).
- The Tipping Act explicitly clarifies that this applies to eligible agency workers (section 27H of the 1996 Act).

Explanation

19. The law on tipping applies to all workers. It does not apply to self-employed people.
20. Employers should apply the principles of fairness, set out in paragraphs 26-31 of this Code, to the allocation and distribution of tips between workers. This includes when there is any mixture of permanent staff, temporary staff, directly recruited staff, agency workers, workers on zero hours contracts or arrangements and part time staff in the same place of business.
21. Employers can promote fairness by ensuring that all individuals working at the place of business (whether employed or engaged by them directly or hired through an agency) are aware of and have clear access to all workplace policies that affect them.

22. Employers must maintain a written tipping policy, and make it available to all staff, unless they receive tips only occasionally and exceptionally. For example, a clothing shop which only receives tips a handful of times a year would not be required to have a written tipping policy, though it would still need to follow the requirement of passing on all tips to the workers who have earned them.

23. In the case of agency workers, any references to “employer” refer to the hirer for this engagement i.e. the place of business where they are working, even where their contract of employment is with an employment agency or an umbrella company. After the hirer has made the payment of tips to an employment agency, the agency is responsible for passing this on to agency workers, without unauthorised deductions.

Fairness

Provisions of The Tipping Legislation

24. Under the Tipping Act, an employer must ensure that the total amount of the qualifying tips, gratuities and service charges paid at, or otherwise attributable to, a place of business of the employer is allocated fairly between workers...at that place of business (section 27D of the 1996 Act).

25. This part of the Code sets out the key principles of fairness for the purposes of the law and the Code, and suggests how employers might wish to apply these to different aspects of developing and implementing a policy on how tips are treated. It will be for each individual employer to determine which specific principles best apply to their business. In the event of unresolved disputes, it is ultimately for employment tribunals to decide whether the employer has acted in compliance with the law.

Factors to Consider

26. Allocating and distributing tips fairly does not necessarily require employers to allocate the same proportion of tips to all workers. There may be legitimate reasons why employers choose to allocate different workers different proportions of tips. However, employers should ensure they give due consideration to all of the workers involved in providing service to customers, including agency workers.

27. Determining those workers who should be included in the distribution of tips should broadly be based on those involved in directly providing service at the place of business when and where tips are left. Regardless of a specific job title, this usually means workers who, as part of their job, personally interact with customers or physically and personally prepare, handle, serve or otherwise provide the food, drink, hospitality or experience that the customer directly consumes or receives at that place of business.

28. Employers should use a clear and objective set of factors to determine the allocation and distribution of tips. The choice of factors should be fair and reasonable given the circumstances and the nature of the individual business.

29. Employers should exercise caution when considering arrangements under which a fixed, minimum or guaranteed monetary sum of tips is allocated to a named individual or category of worker in advance of distribution. Differences between allocations for different roles should arise from objective factors and the amount of tips received, rather than a pre-determined commitment to a fixed sum. Such schemes may be deemed unfair as they risk unfairly increasing the variability of tips for those workers who do not benefit from fixed or guaranteed monetary amounts.

30. Listed below are some of the factors which may be considered by employers, though this list is illustrative rather than exhaustive:

- a. Type of role/work e.g. distribution between front of house and backroom workers, where this affects the extent to which the worker is involved in providing the service at the relevant place of business (as referred to in Paragraph 27 above)
- b. Basic pay
- c. Hours worked during period when tips are received
- d. Individual and/or team performance
- e. Seniority/level of responsibility
- f. Length of time served with the employer
- g. Customer intention

31. When considering whether a method of allocation is fair, the operation of the scheme as a whole must be considered. This includes recognising that payments under the scheme represent a share of the qualifying tips available for distribution and are not additional discretionary payments by the employer. Where a worker or group of workers receives a higher share of tips, the fairness of that allocation should be considered in the context of the overall distribution of tips, including its effect on the shares received by other workers or groups of workers. Isolated examples, whether they appear favourable or unfavourable to a particular worker or role, should not in themselves be treated as determinative of fairness, without appropriate context.

32. Employers must avoid any form of unlawful discrimination when selecting and applying the factors for allocating and distributing tips. Employers must take extra care to avoid indirect discrimination, which may be unintentional, which may be a risk when fewer tips are allocated to a group of workers which includes a disproportionate number of workers with a particular protected characteristic. Further detail, including some worked examples, can be found in the accompanying non-statutory guidance to this Code.

Review and Consultation

33. An employer's written tipping policy must be reviewed at least every three years. The following requirements apply during the initial development of the written policy and during every subsequent review. Employers must consult with workers at the place of business, ideally achieving broad agreement in the workplace that the system of allocation and distribution of tips is fair, reasonable and clear.

34. Consultation should be genuine, considered and conducted in good faith, with sufficient time allowed for those participating, rather than a paper exercise. However, the process remains advisory rather than binding, and employers are not required to follow every suggestion made by workers, as long as they can demonstrate they have followed the requirements of fairness and transparency. Consulting properly can ensure any concerns and issues are understood by employers, and minimise the risk of discrimination.

35. The law states that this consultation should take place with recognised trade union representatives or other worker representatives where they exist, but, if absent, directly with the workers likely to be affected by the policy. The level of trade union representation varies across sectors and individual businesses. Where trade unions are recognised in respect of only part of the workforce being consulted, or different groups of workers are covered by different forms of representation, but not all relevant workers are so represented, employers may also engage directly with the workers affected.

36. Employers may engage in consultation through a variety of methods, including meetings with representatives, group discussions and the use of survey as part of gaining worker feedback. Consultation should be proportionate to the size, complexity and nature of the business. Employers should provide workers with enough information to understand any proposed allocation model and the issues on which views are sought. Consultation should seek views across the relevant groups of workers and should not rely solely on the views of the largest group, or of those who are most vocal or most likely to participate.

37. Employers should keep a reasonable written record of the consultation, including the process, the views expressed within it and the outcomes. A summary of this must be made available, in anonymised form, to all workers at the place of business.

38. A simple majority vote should not be treated as the default or preferred mechanism for consultation. It may not produce a fair outcome, particularly where it would unfairly weight distribution towards the largest group of workers or exclude other categories of workers. Consultation should also take reasonable steps to obtain and consider the views of minority groups, and of workers who may be less likely to participate confidently or directly in the process, including where barriers to participation may arise by reason of language, cultural background, disability, literacy, confidence, or the nature of their role.

39. In some cases, consultation may take place within wider collective bargaining arrangements, whereby representatives of recognised trade unions engage in negotiations over pay terms and related matters. It may be practical to use this as part of a process of consultation on tipping, but employers should also consider additional engagement with non-represented groups, especially where the recognised trade unions represent only a subset of workers.

40. [Further information about the process of consultation, including worked examples to help demonstrate proportionality for different types of employer, will be included in the accompanying non-statutory guidance.]

41. More broadly, an employer's approach to allocating tips should be reviewed by the employer on a regular basis in line with staff turnover and any wider changes to the organisation. There is a risk that a previously lawful and fair method of tip allocation becomes unlawful and discriminatory if certain groups of workers become split on the basis of a protected characteristic. Employers should take active consideration of this, and ensure it is avoided.

42. Particular employers may vary greatly in their business practices. If a particular method of distributing tips is considered fair by the workers affected by it, that may help a tribunal to conclude it to be considered fair and reasonable, provided it does not encompass direct or indirect discrimination. Staff support and agreement with a method of distribution needs to be genuine and not coerced by managers or employers.

Methods of Allocation and Distribution (including tronc)

43. There are various reasonable methods by which tips can be allocated by an employer.

44. An employer may receive the tips directly and then pay workers their share of the tips as part of the next payroll cycle.

45. An employer may also choose to allocate and distribute tips fairly and transparently by using a tronc (section 27F of the 1996 Act). Various tronc arrangements are permitted. An employer may directly appoint a member of staff to be responsible for allocating and distributing tips, and that member of staff can act as an independent tronc operator. An independent tronc operator may also be an external payroll or accountancy firm, or alternatively a member of staff elected or agreed upon by the workers. Care is needed to maintain independence.

46. If an employer chooses to appoint an independent tronc operator, the instructions or framework the employer sets for its operation must be in line with principles of fairness. If they do so, and they have a reasonable belief that the tronc is operating independently and fairly, the employer will be regarded as having followed this Code.

47. However, if the employer later becomes aware of an independent tronc operator acting in an unfair or improper manner, they are obliged to act to address this in order to maintain a fair allocation of tips; this could involve instructing the tronc operator to change its operation, or replacing the tronc operator with an alternative operator, or terminating the tronc arrangement altogether. If the employer fails to act to address such a situation, they can be regarded as having failed to comply with this Code of Practice, and can face enforcement action i.e. being brought to an employment tribunal by a worker or workers if the arrangements made by the employer for allocation through a tronc are no longer fair (see section 27F of the 1996 Act).

Provisions of The Tipping Legislation

48. On handling tips, the Tipping Act states that employers must ensure that all tips are distributed to staff, at the latest, by the end of the month following the month in which the tips are paid by customers (section 27G). For example, if a customer leaves a tip on 23 June, it must be distributed by 31 July at the latest.

Transparency

49. The section above sets out the requirements for employers to review their tipping policies and to consult with their workers when doing so. This section deals with the content which should be in these written policies, and the requirements to keep appropriate tipping records.

Provisions of The Tipping Legislation

50. The Tipping Act (section 27I of the 1996 Act) sets out that the employer is required to have a written tipping policy when qualifying tips are paid at or are otherwise attributable to a place of business on more than an occasional and exceptional basis.

Explanation

51. An employer cannot be said to have met its obligation to handle tips fairly and transparently if individual workers are not aware of their entitlements in line with the tipping policy. This ensures workers can effectively challenge either the employer's tipping policy itself or its implementation, if they consider it to be unfair. Further information can be found in the section below about addressing outstanding issues.
52. The written policy should include how tips are accepted, how tips are allocated and distributed, what steps the employer takes to ensure tips are handled fairly and transparently, in accordance with the Tipping Act, and what steps the employer takes to consult with workers, in accordance with the 2025 Act.
53. Employers are free to decide how to disseminate the written policy to their staff. They can choose to provide it in either electronic form or as a physical written document. If employers want to provide the policy electronically, they may email it directly to staff, upload it to a relevant staff portal or provide it to all workers in another suitable manner.
54. All staff should have the same access to the written policy. The policy should be written in plain language, and employers must provide an accessible format for any worker with a disability, on request.

55. Where agency workers are engaged, employers can provide those workers with a copy of the tipping policy themselves (electronically, or as a physical copy at the start of their engagement) or have the agency share the policy with the worker on their behalf.

56. If employers wish to provide physical copies of the policy, they may do this through a company induction when a worker joins. If they choose to do this, they should make sure that agency workers are not disadvantaged (and so left unaware of the policy) if they are not included in such scheduled meetings when brought in at short notice. Equally, if the employer chooses to display the tipping policy in a break room, they should make sure the agency worker is aware that it is available in the break room and able to have the same access to the break room as directly employed staff.

57. Employers are encouraged to share their written tipping policy with customers, or to display it publicly, as this can enhance confidence and transparency, but this is not a requirement under the tipping legislation.

Provisions of The Tipping Legislation

58. The Tipping Act (section 27J of the 1996 Act) sets out that employers are required to keep records relating to tips, where qualifying tips are paid at, or otherwise attributable to, the place of business on more than an occasional or exceptional basis. The Act also sets out the right for workers to request to view these records.

Explanation

59. The legislative requirements for employers for clear record keeping – and associated rights for workers – are necessary to support fairness and transparency.

60. A tipping record must include detail of all qualifying tips received by the employer at the place of business, and the amount allocated to each worker. This record must be maintained for a period of three years beginning with the date on which the tip was paid.

61. A worker has the right to make a written request – limited to one request per worker in a three month period – to view the tipping record of their employer for a period dating back up to three years, provided they worked for the employer for the full duration of the requested period. An employer must provide their tipping record, including the total amount of qualifying tips received by the employer during the relevant period at the relevant place of business, and the amount allocated to the worker making the request. This must be carried out within a response period of four weeks from the date that the request is received by the employer.
62. Employers also need to consider how to ensure transparency (and by extension fairness) when there are updates to the tipping policy. The same principles and practical considerations as set out above apply. Consulting staff on updates to the policy, as required under the law, is one way to ensure staff consider it fair and ensure transparency. All staff, however they are recruited and engaged, should be equally aware of any changes to the policy from the day they take effect.
63. Tipping records must be stored, processed and disposed of in line with data protection legislation, as defined in the Data Protection Act 2018. The information provided to a worker upon their request must include the total amount of qualifying tips received by the employer at the relevant place of business, and the amount paid to that worker, but not the specific amounts paid to other workers.
64. A fair tipping policy should be clearly explainable without disclosing personal data. Data protection considerations should not be unduly relied upon as a reason for withholding information; disclosure of relevant information can be made without revealing personal data or breaching data protection legislation.

Addressing Problems

65. An employer should ensure they have fair processes in place for resolving issues and responding to queries from workers who have not received the share of tips they expected to. For the purposes of fairness and consultation, employers should ensure they give weight to queries from agency workers as well as their own, directly employed, staff. The Acas Code of Practice on disciplinary and grievance procedures should be followed by employers and workers.
66. Acas is an independent statutory body which offers impartial advice to employers, employees and their representatives on employment rights and obligations. It has expertise in helping parties to maintain good employment relations and resolving disputes where they arise. Acas may be contacted for advice by any party at any time.
67. If internal processes do not successfully resolve the issues raised by workers, there are options for recourse.
68. If the issues remain unresolved, under the Tipping Act a worker can enforce their rights through the employment tribunal system. This includes agency workers. The complaint may be based on a failure to comply with the requirements surrounding fair allocation, distribution and consultation, or the requirements surrounding the written tipping policy and tipping records, or both.
69. If an employment tribunal finds a complaint about fairness or transparency in tipping is well founded, it can make a public declaration to that effect. It will also be empowered to order the employer to revise a previous allocation of tips, make a non-binding recommendation on a previous allocation of tips, or order the employer to pay a worker or workers compensation. This can include other workers at the relevant place of business who have not made a complaint to the tribunal.
70. Further information about the employment tribunal process will be included in the accompanying non-statutory guidance.

Glossary of Terms

The definitions below are intended to aid readers' understanding of the Code, but they do not constitute the precise legal definitions. Readers should refer to the underlying legislation (where applicable) for the precise legal definition.

Agency Worker – an individual who is supplied to work temporarily for and under the control of a hirer (referred to in the Tipping Act as a principal) and has a contract with the agency that supplied them, not the hirer who they are providing their services to. For the precise definition for the purposes of the Tipping Act, see section 27H(1) of the 1996 Act.

Basic Pay – the basic amount of money guaranteed to workers for working the set number of hours in their contract (if employed directly) or for working the duration of an assignment (if they are an agency worker). Tips are not considered to form part of the basic pay even if there is a contractual right to receive them, as this is not a guaranteed amount. Indeed, since 2009, it has been illegal for tips to be used to count towards minimum wage pay in the UK.

Control – references to control in the Code relate to whether or not an employer influences the allocation or distribution of a tip. The question of control is relevant to whether a tip is a qualifying tip for the purposes of the Tipping Act, in that the Act – and by extension this Code – broadly deals with employer-controlled tips. For the precise legal definition for the purposes of the Tipping Act, see section 27C(5) of the 1996 Act.

Employee – typically someone who works under a contract of employment, which sets out their employment conditions, rights and responsibilities. For the precise legal definition, see section 230(1) and (2) of the 1996 Act.

Employer-Received Tip – an amount paid by a customer of an employer by way of a tip, gratuity or service charge which is received upon its payment or subsequently by the employer, an associated person, or by a person under a payment arrangement made between the employer and that person. An example of an employer received tip, is if a customer paid a tip by card which went into the employer's bank account before being distributed to workers. For the precise legal definition, see section 27C(3) of the 1996 Act.

Independent Tronc – a pooling system run by someone independent of the employer. This could be an accountancy or payroll business brought in to run the distribution of tips, or it could be a member of staff appointed by an employer or elected or agreed upon by their fellow workers. There are detailed requirements to meet the test of independence. For the precise definition, see section 27F(6) of the 1996 Act.

Non-Public Place of Business – a physical business premises where customers will not receive service in person from those working for the business. Individuals working at a non-public place of business may fulfil corporate functions or provide remote customer support. For the precise definition, see section 27E(3) of the 1996 Act.

Payment Arrangement – an arrangement between an employer and another person under which payments made by customers of the employer are to be received by the other person instead of the employer. For the precise legal definition, see section 27C(9) of the 1996 Act.

Place of Business – a location where the function of the employer's business is carried out. These can be public or non-public and permanent or temporary premises. For the precise definition, see section 27X(1) of the 1996 Act.

Principal – a business for whom an agency has found a temporary agency worker. They may also be referred to as a hirer or end-client. For the precise definition for the purposes of the Tipping Act, see section 27H(1) of the 1996 Act.

Public Place of Business – a business premises where customers interact with workers of the employer wholly or mainly in-person. For the precise definition, see section 27E(3) of the 1996 Act.

Service Charge – an amount added to the customer's bill before it is presented to the customer. If it is made clear to the customer that the charge is a purely discretionary amount and there is no obligation to pay, the payment is a voluntary service charge.

Tip or Gratuity – a spontaneous payment offered by a customer. This can be in cash, as part of a cheque payment, as a specific gratuity on a credit or debit card payment or paid using a digital payment service or application.

Tipping Policy – a set of written guidelines, which must be produced by an employer and shared with workers, and which sets out the factors considered by that employer to determine the allocation and distribution of tips.

Tipping Record – a document which breaks down the total amount of tips received by an employer at the relevant place of business and the amount passed on to an individual worker. Every worker in the business must, on request, receive the record for their own employment or engagement.

Tronc – a common term for an arrangement used to distribute tips, gratuities and service charges. Many different specific arrangements exist, but in simple terms it refers to a common fund where tips left by customers are pooled before being distributed between workers.

Troncmaster – the person, other than an employer, who is responsible for arrangements to share tips among employees. However, the employer remains liable for the overall fairness and transparency of the scheme.

Wages – the overall amount the worker can expect to receive for a particular shift. This will be made up of the basic pay that the worker is guaranteed as well as any tips that they may be entitled to receive under the Act.

Worker – typically an employee or other person who has a contract to do work or provide services personally for a reward (monetary or a benefit in kind). For the precise legal definition, see section 230(3) of the 1996 Act.

Worker-Received Tip – an amount paid by a customer by way of a tip, gratuity or service charge which is received upon its payment by a worker of the employer and is not subsequently received by the employer or an associated person. For the precise legal definition, see section 27C(4) of the 1996 Act.

[inside of the back cover – for printed publications, leave this page blank]

